10 thoughts:

- Employers and schools can be civic partners in communities – helping young people bounce back
- Start early – particularly if we want to improve boost social capital
- Build opportunities – big and small – you never know what will stick
- The more real the work experience, the more impact
- Employers are good at assessing skills – particularly speaking skills
- The debate about social mobility is changing (stay local/ go further)
- Careers education is only as good as the career's leader – and the capacity they have
- There are skills in subjects, skill across subjects and skilled based subjects – all work together for career readiness
- The work is multi-institutional – by necessity
- Talent gets lost in transition

Market stands

"A fantastic conference and thank you so much for your hard work in organizing a very engaging and informative event which I am sure most participants would have found very useful."

Masterclass Sessions

"I have been re-motivated. I will make more effort to engage the local council as a way of engaging headteachers and SLT."

"I think I have been re-inspired to hold onto my conviction that careers education needs to be about finding the best destination for each child and not to be pressured into pushing the Oxbridge/RG option as if that is the best destination for everyone when we know it isn't."

"Great event for networking, good diverse range of attendees, brilliant refreshments, thank you"
